I deliberately left this work unfinished. Goku, the central character of Dragonball Z, deals with the harshest adversities life can offer, always pushing himself beyond any perceived limitations. The last time I worked on this, I had an autistic friend watching and supporting me. Because he was unauthorized to be in the area I was working, we both got kicked out of the art room. Two weeks later he committed suicide. I dragged on, procrastinating, then Akira Toriyama - the creator of Dragonball Z - died suddenly. At this point I felt this work was not good enough to honor the legacy of Toriyama Sensei, nor that of my late friend. With each adversity I had to dig deeper to work on art. One month ago, my youngest brother, and best friend, "Boogie" committed suicide. I, like Goku, must push through every adversity, constantly pursuing higher levels of strength and fortitude to endure. With every new level comes more and greater difficulties. All of us, like Goku, have the strength to overcome. EVERLASTING! So like Goku, my fight is unfinished. My power's limit is unknown. My work is unfinished because perfection is a journey not a destination. I hope in the end we all unleash our inner Goku to conquer life's adversities. Infinite Potentials. Infinite Possibilities. — Sparceef
